A WORD PERSONAL.

Several newspapers in and out of the State have recently published statements in relation to the sale of the WHIG & COURIER at its present status, which were undoubtedly intended to excite prejudice against the paper and its proprietors, and though we have no desire to parade our personal affairs before the public we cannot in justice to ourselves let these insinuations, which have no foundation in truth, pass unnoticed. The following from the last issue of the Maine Farmer is a fair sample of the items to which we refer —

It is said the Bangor WHIG & COURIER establishment sold for $40,000, a very good bargain for the interests of Mr. Lynde's estate. Circumstance favored them. There was darker, or supposed to be, that the establishment might fall under the control of that wing of the Republican party that entertrain doubts about the divine right of the Hamlin Blaine ring to carry the party as an appurtenance to the ring, and of course the existence of such an anti-ring organ at Hamlin's own home was not to be tolerated for a moment, and so an amount of greenbacks was shelled out at once sufficient to prevent such a disaster. The paper will be wholly loyal now.

All this may or may not be true, but it seems to us that the animus of that above article is such as to qualify them all with "malice and responsible it is said," and we return that no more responsible party than "Farmer would father the above sentiment on it makes with reference to ANY PAPER.

The simple facts in this matter are, that the present proprietors of the WHIG & COURIER negotiated for and purchased the paper as a purely business transaction. The political or personal bearings of the proprietors had nothing to do with the matter, and they are entirely satisfied with their bargain. They owe no explanation to the public or any other living soul which has become cognizant in any way of the transaction.

The present proprietors of the WHIG & COURIER are under no obligations to serve any party or faction. The paper is independent of party position, ring or combination. It is not for sale to any man and to no measures but those which are for the interest of the State and the nation. Whether we may be considered as "Democratic papers in the State, WHIG & COURIER will, under its present management, be the organ of individual independent opinion, and the proprietors are sure that the people of Maine will sustain them in the position they have taken and will be pleased with it.

It is only worthy of remark that in the past the WHIG & COURIER has sustained those men whom the people have delighted to honor and the measures it has advocated has invariably been those which conferred the greatest prosperity and greatest good. It will be the endeavor of the management to make the future of the paper worthy of its past.

The above very plain language indicates sufficiently the feelings of the country to relative to the matter. It is asserted with a good deal of emphasis, that the influential portion of the community in the west is opposed to inflation, the manifesto drawn up by the Democratic and unreasonable party of the Congressional inflationists refusing to sign the Presidential veto, is with half of the time being with the probabilities in favor of the final suppression. The whole of the New England States, New York and the larger Western cities, are full and hearty approval of the veto. There is also a strong feeling among the friends of return specie payments to agitate the question immediately by putting it by itself and discussing it upon its merits without regard to party or sectional implications. After the many speeches which have been made in Congress it seems to us that this course is unnecessary. As the Providence Journal says "The great majority have said in the entire course of the discussion on Wednesday under the veto, all that can be said about it. It is probable that only an isolated one or two members are desirous to the best of their ability, at any and every cost to have their names and longest and most elaborate speeches in the more mockingbird. The veto will be read by everybody, and the arguments of everybody, and the arguments of everybody, and the arguments of

FOREVER.

BY JOHN HOYT OSGOOD.

Those we love truly never die,
Though year by year the sad memorial wreath,
A tribute of love's grief, appears at late and oftenest,
At the fair opening of Spring.

For death the pure life saves,
And from its grave upsprings a new and holier growth,
From Heaven to earth and mortal lessons to it
That those we love shall meet again.

When those who love a dear one's dead
A forgot he was with us here will never cherish
A deep sorrow in it that will not grow among
The buds of a love of death.

Oh, how lovely was the calm of a loving breath
When friends in their last affray among weary years
Or her who bowed in silent adoration not tears,
She at the altar of her God.

Thank God for one true friend
With faces brilliant with the light of truth
Which can bring around us the best and the youthful,
Living or dead by years of death.

Lippincott's Magazine for May.

PASTA'S IDEA OF THE ART OF SINGING.—Madame Pasta remarked that most people, when they study a song, never pause to read and study the words, but set to work at once upon the air. This she observed, was very absurd, and she advised Miss Vaughan, before beginning to learn an aria, to master the full meaning of its words, so as to give them their right expression. "A song," she said, is a dramatic recitation, only instead of speaking, you sing it. If it is cheerful, you must contrive, without exaggeration, however to preserve it carefully. If it be sad, sorrowfully, and if tragic, with as much dignity as you can command." She then imitated, to our great amusement, the ordinary young lady's style of singing a sentimental ballad, in a minute about as expressive as a barrel-organ crying "fresh herrings."

When we were quite at our ease, Madame Pasta invited Miss Vaughan to sing. The young lady sang the contralto cavatina from Semiramide, "Bel piacere." The great artist was pleased with her voice, and kindly undertook to correct her faults from the same air in order to show her how she sang it. Once was enough, but the method, the artistic taste and finish with which Pasta executed a mere air, as an art of declamation, still remain as fine as ever. I shall not easily forget the grand and expressive manner of singing the recitative: "Become a diva in Babilonia." Grisi, it is said, that the Assyrian Queen would thus have pronounced these words when after a long exile she finds herself once more before the august temple of Belus. "Ascendi il Re Tempio" Passing from the recitative to the cavatina: "Bel piacere" Pasta sang it with fervor and pathos, which I cannot describe. She was supported by a chorus of Babylonians, which, with very few exceptions, was composed of Italian singers. Pasta's style of singing was expressive of the most profound feeling, and her whole countenance became animated with the fire of genius. She was indeed a great actress, and her performance was a lesson to all singers.—From the Life and Writings of Beckford.

INDIAN MANNERS AND CUSTOMS.—It is now generally believed that the Burmese, and indeed all the various races and nations of India, have originated at a remote period from the plateaus of Central Asia, and that they are a distinct race. Possessing some of the characteristics of the Hindo, the Canarese, and some also of the Chinamen. Monkish eyes, prominent cheek bones, and flat, short and broad nose of the Tartar, Chinese, and Japanese, and the "frowzy black" hair, rarely curly, and never long, of the Hindoo and the Malays, and though of near the same stature as the latter, they possess in the slender frames of their race the Burmese are a simple-minded people, of pure faith and courteous kind of manners. They are hospitable, readily amused, harmless and agreeable to strangers. They are fond of smoking and gossiping over a cheroot, the cultivation of which, and intercourse with foreigners, consist of but little else. The men, running through a few years of childhood, banana palm or other trees, and beneath and among these, they are all in view, are the little naked boys, closely shaved on the head, with the exception of a tuft of hair, wood palm leaf, bead or string of cowries or fine feet from the head as a preventative against fevers bred by the early dews of the climate, and to the age of seven years the male and female children are entirely dressed alike. Their daily occupations consist of but little in the streets, running through the fields of rice
